Humanity prides itself in being superior to many of the sentient species here on Earth. While it is one of our greater characteristics we have to boast about, we must acknowledge that it stems from our capacity to grow and progress as a species. It has come to the point now, where we have become so arrogant in our mentality that we try to prove that we can outwit nature. We have lost track of what really progresses us forward, and instead of working with nature, we are trying to harness it like an obedient dog, or any other kind of animal that we have domesticated through the ages.

A particular trait that has always distinguished humans against other life forms is our tendency to conform the world around us to our needs instead of changing ourselves to what Mother Nature has to offer us. If only we could see that if we just learned to respect nature and appreciate all that it has given us, we would find that we would spend more time progressing and less time trying to bend nature to our needs. For example, there is so much potential in all the renewable energy sources that the earth gives us that we refuse to embrace. We are so fixated on energy from gas and oil that we won't change ourselves to accept this gift nature has offered us.

In a sense, humanity has the maturity of a teenager in comparison to the seniority of Mother Nature. We fight and rebel against the changes in Mother nature. Rather than respecting her and heeding to her unspoken counsel, we ignorantly believe that we know what's best for us; that we should determine how our future should be shaped. Until we realize that like any wise mother, nature knows what's best for us, we won't progress.
